FEATURING ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR, JILL MATEO

Jill Mateo is an associate professor in the Department of Comparative Human Development, the Institute for Mind and Biology, and the Committee on Evolutionary Biology at the University of Chicago. Mateo received her doctorate in biopsychology from the University of Michigan, and she was a postdoctoral scholar at Cornell University. Mateo’s research focuses on the development of adaptive behaviors. She has studied the mechanisms of two functional behaviors: learning and antipredator strategies (especially the role of stress on acquisition and modification of these behaviors) and recognition of kin (including the genetics of mate choice and the “armpit effect”).
